She hasn't put a step wrong while jetting around the world promoting the highly-anticipated new series of Doctor Who.

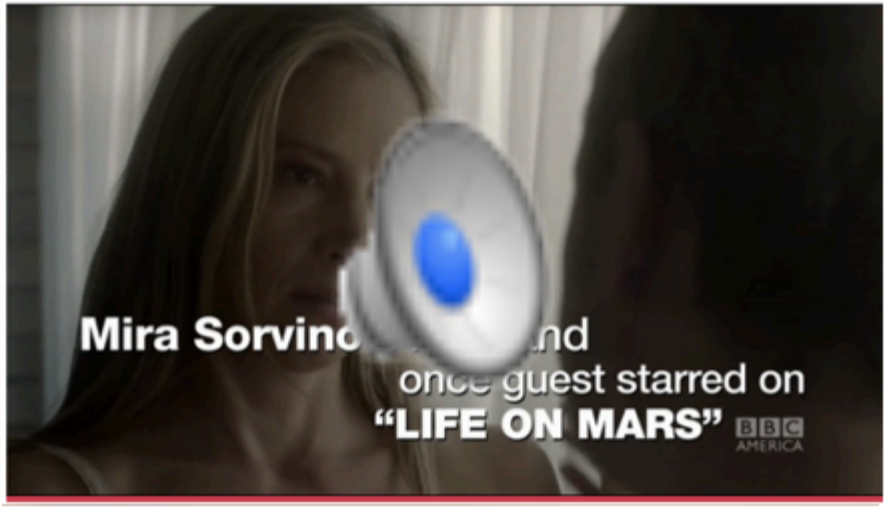

Showing off her tiny waist with a belt, the star oozed grown-up glamour while wearing minimal make-up and her hair simply tied up.

Walking the red carpet in front of a wall of Union Jacks, the actress posed for pictures alongside her new companion, Peter Capaldi.

Kittles plays Gary Fischer, a lawyer friend of ex-cop Jack Whelan (played by Life on Mars' star John Simm) who suspects the organization is responsible for the disappearance of his wife Amy (Mira Sorvino).

They are the clandestine groups with some of the world's most powerful people among their members, from George W Bush, to Bill Clinton.

And now the illicit world of secret societies is set to be put in the spotlight once again, in Intruders - a gripping new paranormal TV series premiering on BBC America on August 23.

New mystery thriller Intruders features a secret society called Qui Reverti, but these powerful groups aren't always merely the stuff of fiction

Simm, who plays retired cop Jack Whelan, reveals how a friend showing up and telling him about a secret society coincides with his wife's odd behaviour.

New Doctor: Peter Capaldi's debut as The Doctor was so astute and assured it quickly confirmed that he has the type of wily charisma that makes it a role he was born to play
